I Waded In Clear Water: A Novel

Allison Parrish

November 2014
Preface

This novel was generated from the text of Gustavus Hindman Miller’s Ten Thousand Dreams, Interpreted. The “What’s In A Dream” section of Miller’s book functions as a dream dictionary: you look up a word, and find out what it means to dream about that word’s referent. Each word has multiple interpretations, and most of these interpretations can be broken down into what I call an action and a denotation:

To see an oak full of acorns, denotes increase and promotion.

In this entry, See an oak full of acorns is the action, and increase and promotion is the denotation. The text of this novel was made by extracting the actions and changing them to first-person, past-tense sentences:

I saw an oak full of acorns.

The denotation for each action is scored using a sentiment analysis algorithm, and the sentences are printed in order by the sentiment of their corresponding denotation, from most negative to most positive. (According to the sentiment analysis algorithm, the first sentence of the novel, “I saw a healthy belly,” is the worst thing that can happen in a dream; the last sentence, “I waded in clear water,” is the best thing.)

Elaborations, in the form of footnotes, are provided for many sentences. These elaborations are generated using information in ConceptNet (in particular, the IsA, HasProperty, and AtLocation relations) and WordNet (for part-of-speech checks, synonyms, and antonyms).
